Skeletal studies of violence in prehistory face many challenges, including fragmented or incomplete records, small sample sizes and confident diagnoses of violence-related injuries and the implements that may have caused them. At the same time bioarchaeology has the potential to open exciting new avenues of research into past violence. This presentation will draw on a number of population and site-based studies from prehistoric Europe that have addressed some of the challenges, showing how age, gender and local practice influence patterns of violence found in the bioarchaeological record. It will also highlight the importance of the emerging field of experimental bioarchaeology and the usefulness of experiments that try to replicate past violent practices through actualistic rather than fully controlled lab-based approaches.

Tomas Alusik is inviting you to a scheduled Zoom meeting.
